Beyond Benefits

Is Workplace Mental Health Support Really Reaching Employees?

Edwin Onencan & Sandra Gonçalves

HAVING SUPPORT

IS NOT THE SAME AS FEELING SUPPORTED

The Problem

Companies mental health benefits vs Employee experience

Our investigation

Employee survey responses vs companies public communications about mental health benefits

Our Objective

How mental health support is provided, communicated[2] and discussed in the workplace

Our expected contribution

Identify opportunities for companies to narrow the gap between the support they communicate and the support that is experienced by the employees

METHODOLOGY

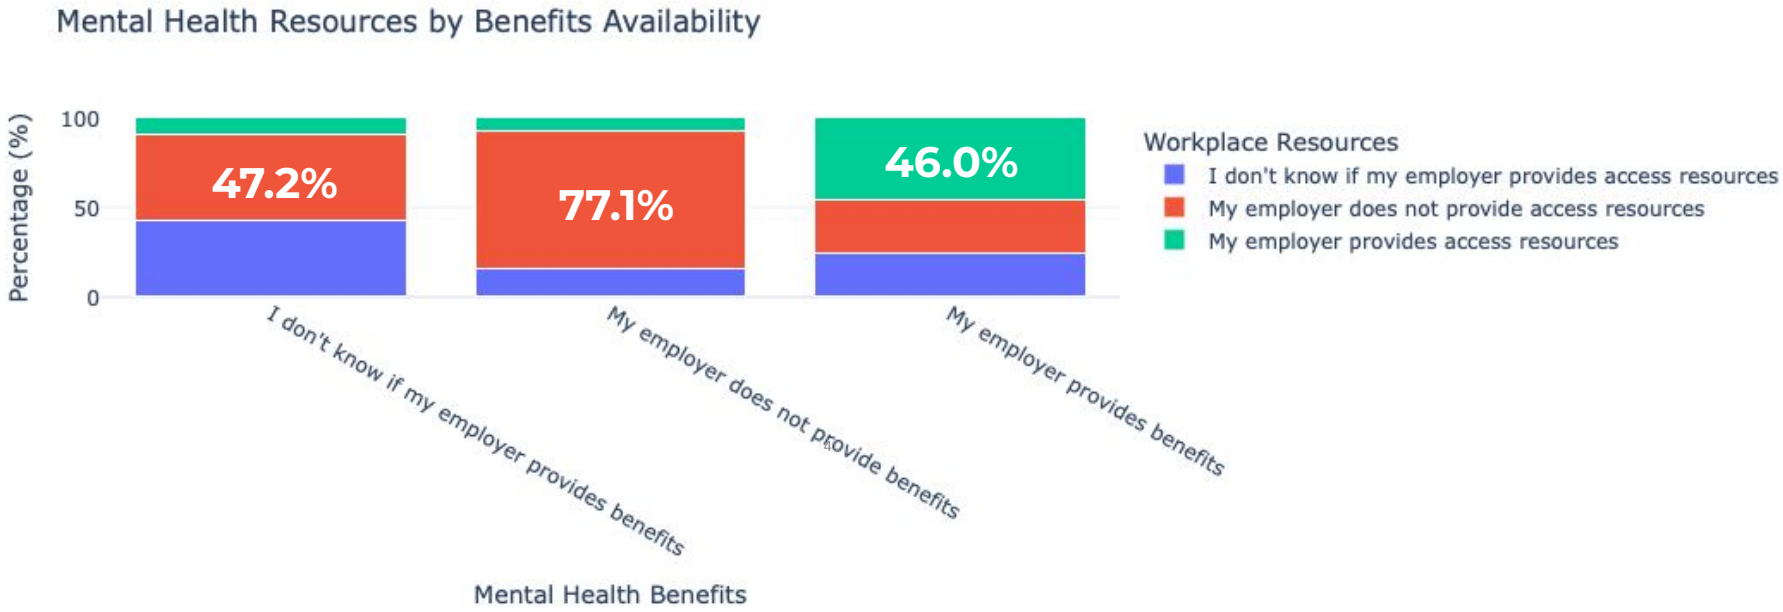

Exploratory and descriptive analysis with Python, supplemented by web scraping.

Sources

- OSMI Mental Health in Tech Survey[3]

- Official pages from tech companies

EMPLOYEE SURVEY: The Employee Perspective

H1: Employees who report mental health benefits are also more likely to report available mental health resources

EMPLOYEE SURVEY: The Employee Perspective

Does you employer provide mental health BENEFITS?

62,4% Yes

25,5% I don't know

12,1% No

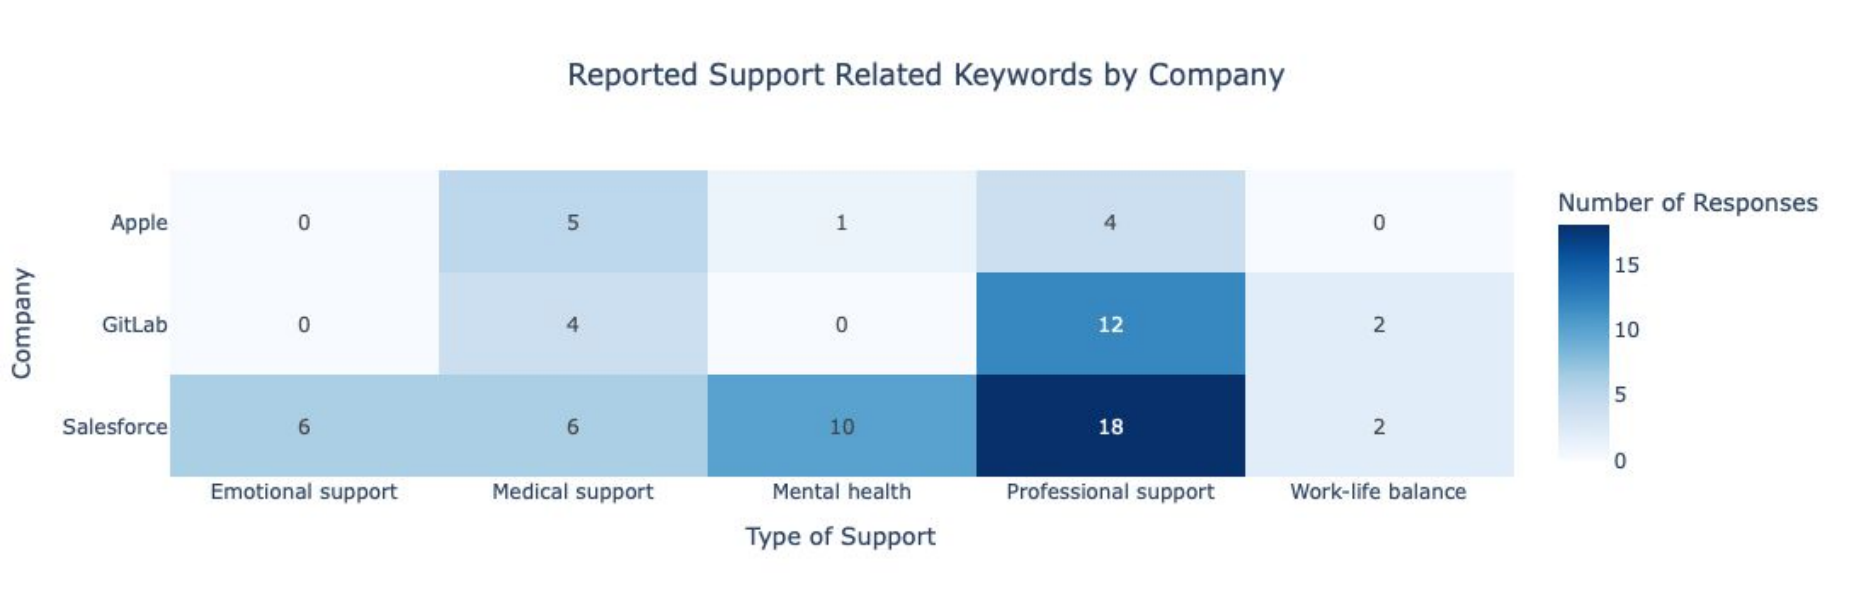

H2: Significant proportion of employees do not know whether their employer provides mental health benefits.

EMPLOYEE SURVEY: The Employee Perspective

H3: Employees who have discussed mental health with colleagues are more likely to have discussed it with their employer.

WEBSITE ANALYSIS: The Organisational Perspective

H4: Organisations highlight the availability of mental health resources more often than they communicate how employees can access them.

Employee awareness does not always match benefit availability of employees uncertain about benefits were also uncertain about workplace resources[8]

43.2%

IMPLICATION : Employers should provide clearer, more accessible, and more targeted communication about mental-health support.

Availability of workplace benefits

Employee awareness of those benefits

FINAL TAKEAWAY

Mental Health Support + Clear Communication + Means for easy access

Questions?

THANK YOU

Edwin Onencan & Sandra Gonçalves